American Water Works Position Paper
Significance of Consolidation and the Proposed RWE Acquisition

Background

Reliable water service, which is essential to community health, safety and economic prosperity, requires:

- o Access to massive amounts of new capital for investment
- o Unique professional and technical talent, and
- o Sophisticated regional planning, investment and operations for the long term.

Large financial investments are constantly required to fund community development and to address environmental regulation, the demands of technology, and the need to upgrade and replace the aging infrastructure in our communities. At the same time, customers are using less water.

In other words, the amount of investment for each customer has increased while water use by each customer is dropping. As a result, professional water systems must constantly look for ways to operate most cost effectively.

The Trend Toward Consolidation

The United States has about 54,000 water systems which has resulted in a significant amount of fragmentation. The large number of systems, most of which serve fewer than 5,000 customers, makes the water utility industry ripe for consolidation. It's one of the most significant initiatives in the search for cost efficiency and operational expertise.

Consolidation creates size and stability that increases the capacity to attract capital at a lower cost. It also enhances regional planning and expands a company's capability to attract and retain professional and technical talent.

Consolidation and American Water Works

At American Water Works, we have been able to enhance our ability to address water resource issues across the United States through a series of consolidations. This started with the coming together of more than 100 small water companies in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, and has continued right up through today. We invest capital and combine resources to ensure reliable water services in 1,300 communities throughout 23 states. These actions have resulted in enhanced service to consumers at a lower cost than otherwise possible.

Continuing Consolidation

American Water, a New Jersey-based company, owns water systems in states stretching from New England to Hawaii. This cross-country reach, which has been achieved through consolidation, has not interfered with, disrupted, or otherwise compromised the regulation or control of the water resources in local communities. To the contrary, there is clear evidence that water system consolidation has enhanced essential long-term policy planning and implementation in the communities we serve.

The proposed acquisition of American Water by RWE is the next logical step in our company's focus on consolidation. It is perfectly consistent with our financial and operational strategies that have proven the value of consolidation in the past. Once the transaction is complete, American Water will join with Thames Water, an RWE company that operates water and wastewater systems in London and in several other major markets worldwide.

Our relationship with RWE/Thames will present enhanced access to capital at lower long-term costs than would be available to American Water independently. It will also significantly expand our access to technical and professional resources to address complex operational, environmental and engineering issues associated with delivering reliable water services. This will be accomplished under the same local, regional and state regulatory oversight that is in place today.

Underpinnings of Agreement

American Water carefully considered the acquisition proposal from RWE from three critical perspectives:

- o The investor
- o The customers and community
- o The employees of the company

In each case we concluded that this transaction will enhance and improve what we do, and it will allow us to continue to deliver the essential public service that water represents, at a lower cost than otherwise possible.
